A DESCRIPTION OF THE PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE OF SHELDON JACKSON.

BY Theodora Culver .

Few pioneers are able to bequeath personal records of a half century. Yet Sheldon Jackson , 1834 - 1909 , did this very thing. Wherever he travelled , whether by horseback, stagecoach , steamer , sledge or train , he carried writing materials along, and left behind in his own and his friends' letters historical material of first rate importance . While other men were struggling to exploit the great territories then opening up before their eyes , - he pushed his way to the front ranks of the explorers, traders , prospectors and adventurers , and planted in the remotest places , the American flag , the Church and the School House . The scope of his work was colossal : geographically , it extended from the Mississippi to the Pacific, from Mexico to Alaska ; chronologically from 1856 to 1909 ; sociologically , it reached from the Explorer-Pioneer Era to the Present.

In 1904 , when he had already reached the age of 70 , Jackson began to sort through the accumulation of letters he had preserved through his long life of public service. Some of them were almost illegible because of poor handwriting or bad ink or flimsy paper . As he looked them over, he realized that here on these faded and crumpled pages, was the real history of the great Northwest. With the help of 27 different typists of varying abilities , but equal enthusiasm, he had the mass of papers typed, then copied by letter press and bound into books, which he called : " CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO PIONEER PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONS WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI AND MISSOURI RIVERS AND IN ALASKA. 1856 - 1908. " The letters took up 8,000 (single space) typewritten pages , and are bound in 22 volumes. These were presented to the Congressional Library and to the Library of the Presbyterian Historical Society *. The manuscript letters were also deposited in the latter . The letters have been carefully summarized on Library cards, giving the reference to the Catalogue number, the date, place of origin, author and recipient. The Chronological File of these letters is now being made available to research students by the Presbyterian Historical Society . Catalogues of the correspondence grouped according to author and place will be available within the next few months.  Very few of the letters Jackson kept , were written by himself, but each one from a correspondent , involved one or more (un-preserved , or not-now-available) letters from himself. His Official Correspondence , as General Agent for Education in Alaska , belongs to the Office of Education , in Washington, DC , and comprises 42 volumes.

When the Correspondence begins , Sheldon Jackson, then a young missionary superintendent , is established in a hospitable home , where no preacher , young or old , is ever turned away without a sympathetic hearing good food, a comfortable bed, and a chance to read some good books or magazines. Through long, weary journeyings in all the vicissitudes of season and terrain, he strove to see that all the remotest regions were given a chance to have decent schools and religious services. He had the ability to locate - as if by instinct - those areas where population was to grow, and land become valuable. By his knowledge of conditions in the country he covered so diligently in his incessant travels , he won an undisputed place as the best informed man on Alaska , at the beginning of the 20th Century.

He became not only the helper of the friendless Alaskan girl, alone in a hosyile town with a fatherless baby - but also , the coveted guest of the wealthy and the influential leaders of his time. He was interested in Exploration , Travel Routes, Railroads , Building , Ethnology , Anthropology Education , Colonization , Animal Husbandry, Agriculture , Religion , and most of all Home Missions . His great activity, ability to choose the point at which to attack the forces of Satan successfully , and his fearless initiative, often brought him into sharp conflict with others. He was most magnificent - his admirers said , when he was marshalling the facts that acquitted him from the charges periodically brought against him. He was a shameless and powerful lobbyist in Congress. By sheer persistence and hard work, he forced slowly through the regular channels, the measures Alaska and its people needed to become truly a part of American life. His journeys showed him the plight of Alaskan natives whose livelihood failed as the whaling, cannery and mining interests took over the territories over which nature's children had roamed for ages. He conceived and carried out the great project of domesticating Siberian Reindeer for the use of the peoples of Alaska. While engaged in this difficult task , he perceived a danger to freedom of thought and American institutions in the domination by Mormon influence of Utah's Higher Educational system; and spent weary years and much of his own resources in holding a foothold for free, Christian Education in that state.

He frequently came into conflict with the necessarily conservative Board of Home Missions. It was laboring under a numbing weight of debt. Sometimes it withheld the pitiful stipends of remote home missionaries, until more vociferous demands were met. It viewed with extreme trepidation, the rapid advance into new fields, where Jackson was always pushing it. On the other hand , the Board had a stimulating effect upon Jackson, whose multifarious activities might have checked his pioneering energies in mid-course , had not a letter from a Board Secretary in 1877 challenged him to undertake a great missionary tour of the Northwest. Consultation with the ministers already in that area, made Jackson decide to press on into the practically unknown region of Alaska, acquired by our Government in 1867 and then neglected. As over against the occasional clashes between Jackson and the Board of Home Missions, must be set the exceptionally friendly relations that always existed between him and the church women working for Home Missions. He understood their problems and foresaw the important part they were destined to have in the work of their country , and responded generously to their request for his help as they took the first steps into a more effective organization.

The human interest will make the strongest appeal to some readers of the correspondence . There are : the heroic , young minister ready for any sacrifice except the discipline of steady effort for a distant goal ; the anguished mother of a wayward son ; the naïve confession of the Alaskan school-girl ; the selfish protege , mistaking generosity for reward of merit ; the misfit, succeeding after many failures ; the aspirant after political honors ; the hero meeting untimely death ; the religious fanatic and his loyal wife ; the missionary, whose undisputed authority led to spiritual and intellectual decay ; the meticulous scientist ; the pious reformer ; the pompous secretary; the bewildered secretary ; the gossipy secretary ; the loyal supporter ; the enthusiasts for denominational loyalty that later found a larger horizon as they began to comprehend the magnitude of the Christian task ; the foolhardy saints ; the irresistible saints - all these - left their records in Sheldon Jackson's mail box .

In short , this remarkable collection of letters - as Jackson , himself , wrote in 1904 , gives :

"a true picture-with the lights and shadows of the every day life of the heroic, God-fearing men and women, who with great self-denial , much suffering and many tribulations , laid the foundations of Christian institutions and Christian states west of the Mississippi River."
